

Autism and Parental Blame

Understanding families' experience of parental blame when they approach health, education, and care services for support.

What this project is about

This research study seeks to understand how parents of autistic children experience parental blame when they approach health, education, and care services for support.

This survey is part of the wider Autism and Parental Blame research project, led by ADASS West Midlands in collaboration with the University of Birmingham and commissioned by NHS England (Midlands Region).

Why?

Working together with families we will identify common concerns and themes and make recommendations for changes to practice that will ensure families feel heard and understood when they look for help.

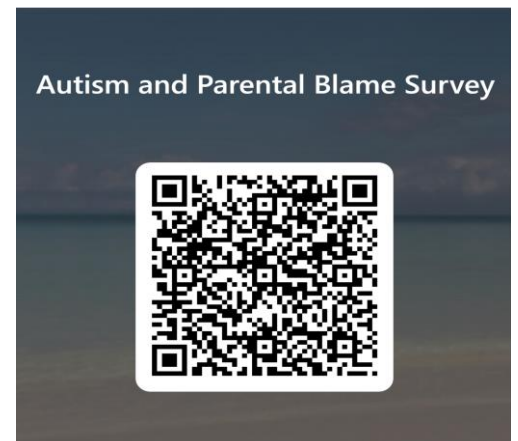

To find out more contact

debbie.hollingsworth@wm-adass.org.uk

or

laura.ferguson@wm-adass.org.uk

1. Take part in the survey - open until 01st May 2023

2. Volunteer to be interviewed

3. Share information about this project with families

Autism and parental blame research
WMADASS (wm-adass.org.uk)